Here at Noah's Ark Zoo Farm, we are passionate about British native species as well as exotic animals. Our zoo provides a wonderful home to hundreds of species of native wildlife, including a dedicated conservation area.

The issue of culling badgers in England has greatly divided opinions among the public and we recognize that badger culling is an emotive subject. Noah's Ark Zoo Farm is not supportive of badger culling. Wildlife conservation is an issue of great importance to us here at Noah's Ark and we are gearing up to do even more conservation work with native wildlife.

Managing Director Larry Bush said, "Conservation is our main priority here at Noah's Ark. In addition to our European Endangered Species programmes for exotic animals (EEC), we have a thriving native conservation programme. We plan to grow our work with native conservation even more over the coming years and ensure we continue to offer sustainable habitats to the widest variety of native species."

As a zoo we are committed to educating the public about wildlife, conservation, and sustainability. We are dedicated to giving our visitors a great experience and inspiring visitors about the wonders of the natural world and have been recognized for this with our Green Tourism Business Scheme Gold Award.

We are aware of some statements that have arisen from an article dating back to 2013, from our former CEO Anthony Bush, who retired from the zoo over two years. Anthony has his own personal opinions on current issues. However, these opinions are not affiliated with or shared by Noah's Ark Zoo Farm. We have respect for all animals, both wild and exotic, and we wish to reassure our visitors and the public of our stance on such topics.
